Co-Presidents' Corner for October

AAUW Pendleton has been thriving this last year and a half. I love how we have managed to stay informed and active during this challenging time.

Our programs have all been educational. I look forward to and enjoy every program at our general meetings. Many thanks to our program committee.

We are so lucky to have the talented Dianne Barnes set up and manage our Zoom meetings! In fact, all of our creative and energetic branch members set us apart.

Many of us participated in the Summer Skills Camp two years in a row. The Camp has been a wonderful opportunity to share ideas and strategies to improve and promote our branches throughout the state. We were able to meet others in Oregon and get together and learn thanks to Zoom. So many would not have been able to participate if we all had to get to a specific location. We can truly be grateful to our state and local leaders for being flexible and creative!

I'm looking forward to grapefruit time again this year. Although I can't eat grapefruit, it's fun to buy a box or two to share with staff and neighbors.

-Kathryn Chaney, Co-President

Our October 7 speaker: Andrew A. Clark, DVM – Doctor of Veterinary Medicine

Subject: "Women in Agriculture in Africa"

Profile by Harriet Isom

Andrew has an eight-page resume, attesting to his long and amazing career at home and abroad! He hasn't really retired. He still does volunteer assignments in Africa and loves to write about his colorful and service-minded life experiences.

He hails originally from Michigan, and he earned his BS and PhD in Veterinary Medicine from Michigan State University in the early 1960s.

He has had two quite separate careers as a veterinarian: one career (26 years) in Africa—Egypt and Eastern and Southern Africa with a few involvements in the Near and Middle East—and a second career (22 years) in Oregon.

In 1964, he left the day after graduation from university for Africa as a Peace Corps Volunteer (PCV) in Tanganyika (now Tanzania), and that led to his many years of work on that continent in animal disease control programs and in broader fields of agricultural development and food supply stabilization.

The livestock health programs he oversaw could involve as many as an astounding one million cattle and one million sheep and goats, as was the case in his work with the Masai in northern Tanganyika. There he won the trust and admiration of the Masai in his annual vaccination campaign of 850,000 cattle to control Rinderpest, the worst cattle disease ever known.

In the US, he was State Veterinarian of Oregon on disease control programs in large livestock populations. And he designed the emergency response system for dealing with the incursion of exotic livestock disease.

His outstanding service and contribution to international understanding of veterinary medicine was given wide recognition in 2017 when he was awarded the American Veterinary Medical Association International Prize. His development of unified, cross- country procedures for livestock disease control was highlighted. And he was responsible for breaking the cycle of exposure to avian influenza in Egypt though innovative container slaughter protocols. It was fascinating to have Andrew show me several years ago the pictures he designed to show illiterate Egyptian villagers how to properly slaughter a chicken.

His long years of experience today underscore his philosophy of bottom-up development work. He seeks to engage with the people at the bottom of the economic ladder. Finding ways to stabilize livelihoods at this level requires, he notes, the creation of innovative approaches (such as his pictures for a village). And, here in Oregon, in dealing with livestock disease regulations, he believed in establishing good public relations with the livestock industry. His approach was not a top-down enforcement effort that the industry resisted but one of thorough explanations that convinced the industry of how best to counter livestock disease threats.

I was attracted in his resume to his 15 praiseworthy concepts of development work of which the first one is: Stop—listen—and learn; and the last one is: Stability—the magic word of development. From my own experience in the foreign service, his concepts are well worth heeding.

Andrew lives in Pendleton with his wife, Barbara. Theirs was such an unusual romance that some of the story merits telling here. Barbara Bainbrige, as she was then, was also a PCV working in Tanganyika, and she came to Andrew's remote village among the Masai to help give vaccinations to the inhabitants against smallpox. Andrew saw her just as her project finished, and he was immediately smitten, reasoning that she would share his dedication as an adventurous, risk-taker who would share his passion for being of service to the needlest. Not only that, but her initials, BB, were pronounced like "bibi" in Swahili, and bibi in Swahili meant sweetheart! But she left Tanganyika on travels for six months in the Middle East and South Asia.

How was he going to contact her? He wrote a letter to her home in Ft. Bragg, California, where she later settled to become a teacher! And after a long exchange of letters, it was arranged that she would spend a Christmas with him back in Tanzania, one that proved full of wildlife bonanzas and great camping trips. He proposed at the airport as she was leaving, and she enthusiastically said "yes." Their 1968 wedding in the remote Tanganyika village didn't have family present but had some 300 people of the local populace, as well as a few aid workers in the region. Andrew's gardener, a respected elder, gave away the bride. Andrew provided the 500 beers and sodas that were gone in about 10 minutes, and the Masai roasted the goats, one sheep, and one wildebeest over open fires for the wedding feast.

Their honeymoon was in Ngorongoro Crater where there is a little cabin in the woods for wildlife researchers. For anyone who has visited that crater, you will know how lovely it is and how much wildlife inhabits it. They started married life, in Andrew's words, "To the African symphony of lions roaring, hyenas whooping, jackals barking, zebras braying and wildebeest grunting."

Andrew and Barbara have raised five children, three of their own and two adopted.
